Walking the Armory with
Jenny Jaskey

The Armory Show is an annual event that celebrates artists from around the world and their contributions to contemporary culture. This year, the show featured a range of works from emerging and established artists, each with their unique perspectives and approaches to art-making.

Jenny Jaskey, a curator and writer, joined us on a walking tour of the Armory Show to discuss the various artworks on display. She highlighted the diverse range of artists featured, including emerging talents and established figures, and discussed the role of the Armory Show in shaping the art world.

Jaskey emphasized the importance of looking beyond the surface of an artwork to understand its deeper meanings. She encouraged viewers to engage with the works, to ask questions, and to think critically about the messages being conveyed. She also stressed the importance of supporting emerging artists, whose work can often be more experimental and challenging.

Throughout the tour, Jaskey pointed out several notable works, including pieces that explored themes of identity, social justice, and environmental issues. She encouraged viewers to explore these works in detail, to consider the context in which they were created, and to think about how they might reflect on their own lives and experiences.

Overall, the Armory Show is a vibrant and dynamic event that offers a unique opportunity to engage with contemporary art and to think critically about the role of art in society.
